SUBJECT Soviet Efforts to Gain Access to U.S.
POW's in North Vietnam

SOURCE [REDACTED]

1. As of April 1972 the residency in Hanoi of the Chief Intelligence Directorate of the USSR Ministry of Defense (GRU) had for a long time the standing requirement to get direct access to U.S. POW's being held by the North Vietnamese. The North Vietnamese, however, despite repeated requests from the Soviets, had never provided access to the prisoners. Although the Soviets know where the POW compounds were located and could even drive past them, they had no access to the compounds or the POW's.

2. The GRU residency in Hanoi learned through agent operations the names of some of the POW's and asked the North Vietnamese for access to specific individual prisoners. The North Vietnamese did not accede to these specific requests. [REDACTED] Comment: [REDACTED] did not know whether specific names of POW's known to the GRU residency in Hanoi were forwarded to Moscow, but he assumed that they were.) The usual North Vietnamese response to Soviet requests was that access to the prisoners for questioning was not necessary and that they would tell the Soviets everything about the prisoners. The North Vietnamese expressed bewilderment as to why the Soviets would wish to talk with the prisoners.

3. The North Vietnamese never provided any information on the prisoners to the Soviets through official liaison channels. In response to specific questions the North Vietnamese answered only in general terms. As of April 1972, the GRU residency in Hanoi had for some time been undertaking unspecified measures to persuade the North Vietnamese authorities to grant access to the prisoners.

4. Soviet press personnel in Hanoi attended press conferences organized by the North Vietnamese to exploit the prisoners. However, the Soviet representatives were not afforded any special rights.
